New York City musician Karl Bartosiewicz's "My Coffeecup" is one of the weirdest, most charmingly illustrative songs you'll ever hear. The story behind it: Bartosiewicz was on a plane in the United States but didn't have an electronic device, so when the pilot announced the emergency landing, he pulled out his landline to call his girlfriend. The song, which was released March 18 on Bartosiewicz's new label, Sugar Water, the result of an online co-creative project launched by the Brooklyn DIY label, goes like this: "I called her / and I said / I have to share my coffee cup / so I know she's ok." On his Facebook page, Bartosiewicz calls it "a really warm but goofy song." "On a plane, there's usually only enough time for small talk before things go quiet," he says. "I started making a short story out of that conversation. The instrumental part is one chord the whole way through that kind of nods to the plane's rock 'n' roll history. A lot of people and places influenced it." The accompanying video shows the pilot, Bartosiewicz and his pal Patrick Adamson of PUP and Foxygen, flying to Jamaica by jet plane to visit the apartment of someone Bartosiewicz once knew. North West Reading is where you will find all the Pubs, Food, Beds, Shops, History, Schools, Amenities and Barriers, that make this a special area.
